There is considerable black about the new bonnets and hats. Beavers, felts, velvets, ribbons, ornaments, feathers, quills, coques and birds are as dark as the melancholy robes of woe. This is good for trade, but bad

Head she reduces her apparent height. Remarkably tall women will never wear anything else. A tall leading lady or soprano with a short star or tenor is able to overcome the discrepancy when the scene admits of a black Gainsbornough. Only the exceptional facts are large velvet popples in beautiful regular features, a faulty complexion, beautiful art colors; velvet morning-glories in the normalizatival colors, linen roses in the morning-glory pinks, blues and rede; violets and violet leaves, ostiton tips used in clusters, rooster feathers true to Mre, but with Jet of the complexion of the same in architecture and the dome of heaven is blue, white and silver, it is the same in architecture—tapering turrest, pointed steeples, and light or delicate head finishing. One never sees a black ceiling. A dark good warfs a little house. Lotty rooms are made cosier by the use of a dark frieze or papered ceiling.

But that is not business. Women love black. They buy it and wear it, and modistes would be foolish if they did not supply it.

modistes would be foolish if they did not supply it. Black millinery is the rage this moment. What it will be in ten days or a month from now cannot be conjectured. At this season particularly fashions fluctuate, and goods are as unsteady as grains in the stock market. To show the vagaries of trade, the pattern bonnets have no strings, no lace, no straps of any sort under the chim. Many buyers will adopt this style at once, but others, on the contrary, who originate their own styles, will make strings the fashion.

Eminence shades—the ecclesiastical purple and violet colors—cherry reds and autumn greens are the fashionable colors. The minence purples are very trying, but most beautiful. They are used in velvets on hats, turbans and bennets, but introduced so as not to jar with the colors in a bilious, sailow, pallid or pale face. Usually the crown is made of the gray-green purple; black braid, beaver or felt forms the brim, and a jet or Rhine stone crescent, a rosette of neutral silk or a feather of some sort produces the harmony required. If the face is too characteristic, then the eminence appears in the back. The cherry reds are generally becoming and very rich. With black the combination is gorgeous. A rather unique effect is produced with a medium black ng and very rich. With black the com-bination is gorgeous. A rather unique effect is produced with a medium black brim, a flower-poterown of the ex-heart cherry velvet, a knot or two of black and white silk and a few black spar-rows with jetted wings. This idea could be carried out in a bonnet as well.
